Bantams Put Up Sensational Battle Before Crowd Which Packed Madison Square Garden-Bout Nip and Tuck Right to the End, Although Sharkey Was Floored Cleanly in Seventh Round.

By Vincent Treanor.

UNCHED totlering across the ring in the fifteenth and last round from Joe Lynch's corner, at Madison Square Garden last night, Jack Sharkey instinctively sought the safety of his own. Here he doubled imself up, crossed his short, thick right arm protectingly over his face and tried to make the left shield him from the punches Lynch might shoot into his body. Lynch followed him closely, and as sharkey turned around to face the music. as it were, Lynch drove in a curving right to the jaw. The sturdy legs of Sharkey quivered. Lynch then, pushing the arms of Sharkey away from his face, duplicated the punch. Little Jack felt the sting of the second blow, but he still held his feet spread punch, Sharkey sank to the ground without being hit. His legs wouldn't Haley got to "nine" and Sharkey rose slowly, gameness written on his ace, but with stamina ebbing. Lynch piled right into him. Sharkey had enough fighting sense left to try to cover up, but Lynch, flared by victory lu his grasp, drove a right through Jack's guard. Still Sharkey stood up. Sharkey showed the first signs of being up against it at this stage, but he woke up so suddenly that he startled both Lynck and the crowd. The merriest old give and take punching bee we've seen in a long while ensued. They fought along the ropes.
